Buying a Recreational Vehicle can incur significant expense, even when buying second-hand vehicles. Making the right decision can provide a great investment in terms of future lifestyle enjoyment. It is crucial to explore the varied array of vehicle types on offer and match your selection against criteria such as living space, luggage space, engine power, running costs & suitability to different environments.

Brand names can often provide a guide as to the type and quality of goods being offered. Unlike the global brands of cars such as Ford, General Motors and Chrysler, many of the US RV manufacturers are not familiar names to those outside of the US. It therefore becomes important to get specialist help and advice when considering an RV.

Sources of information worth considering include specialist RV magazines, some internet sites and companies who specialise in the import of vehicles. It would also be worth talking to some of the existing RV owners. Many of those who visit the Americana event are happy to talk about their vehicles (both current vehicles and those on their wish list!) So there is no excuse not to find out more about these great vehicles and the opportunities they offer for their owners.
